The difficulties presented to the American people were formidable, but they achieved ligher glories in these civic difficulties than they had won upon the battle-fields of the Revolution, brilliant and noble as they were.

The Confederation was a compact of the States, and had all those elements of weakness which we have portrayed. The great minds of the Revolution were deeply oppressed with the alarming atate of things. Thoughtful men everywhere saw the dangers that threatened the youthful freedom of North America, hut there was, probably, but one mind that looked through the clouds that hung heavily over the conntry, and saw the sunlight in full splendor beyond them. That mind was Alexander Hamilton's.

But, though the evils were seen, the difficulty was to devise means for a remedy. The immi

An immense business is carried on in uncurrent money, checks on broken backers, &c., out of which heavy profits are being made, at the expense of the public of course. Most of this is specifed bankers in ve agents employed throughout the city, for the purchase of checks on themselves. In this way they are paying off their deots at a large-discount, while professing to settle in full with their creditors. In this mode of doing business some people may be able to discover fragments of honor or justice, but the ancient code of honesty would strip it of every particle of a respectable character. We have may progressive age, though. If these parties have cash to buy checks on themselves at a discount, why do they not declare a dividend This would be the proper way to use the money in their hands, which certainly helongs to their creditors.
